Excerpt: .get a situation, Milly, he said the day before he left; and if I can I will send mother half my wages. I suppose there are plenty of people that would be glad to have you, said Milly. Yes: Mr. White has promised to make inquiries for me while I am away, so that I daresay there will be two or three places for me to choose from when I go back. But Arthur s expectations upon this matter were doomed to disappointment. Mr. White had not heard of anything when he reached London, and day after day passed without bringing him the wished-for intelligence. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, and of this bitter heart-sickness Arthur tasted as weeks passed; and to all Mr. White s inquiries of friends and customers whether they knew of a situation for a steady active lad, the same answer was returned with a few modifications-- Not at present; will let you know if I should. At last Arthur thought he would himself make inquiries, and before setting out he knelt down and asked--nay, I am afraid he demanded in his impatience that God would give him a situation before night. He had heard and read of remarkable answers to prayer, and now expected that God would work a miracle if it were necessary to answer his. Many a weary mile he walked that day, and came home at length disappointed, with hard thoughts of God in his...
