Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER XVI Beckys Lessons January, with its fresh new year, came in with much roaring and howling, and February closed with a storm that carried just a flake or so of snow--enough for the children to know that it was really snow--and then, after a glorious sunset, came a day almost like summer. Mrs. Vance was no worse than usual, and yet was little better. Today she was in bed--tomorrow she might be up attending to her share of the household duties. But through it all, whether from the bed or about the house, she would teach and train her little flock. Now she was propped up in bed, her black hair against the shawl contrasting with the ivory whiteness of her face. She was crocheting while hearing her daughters lessons. Rebekah stood under Dicks cage clad in her spotless gingham apron, her face scrubbed until her very nose shone. Her hair was parted in the middle, and by the most painstaking brushing, each rebellious strand had been induced to remain in its place. Dick chirped once or twice, scratched on the bottom of his cage, as if to give warning, and then sent a shower of seeds scurrying down upon Beckys head. How clear and beautiful everything looked outside; and what a day for a long ride. The red birds and the sky and the old leafless trees seemed to beckon and say, Come out, little, girl, and be one with us. How...
