Alexander I do not know why it is, I fear most for him; it cannot be I love him best. She stooped and kissed the rosy lips, and a tear dropped upon them. How happy, how happy, when we are all eternally safe, I and the children whom God has given me! and you, my dear husband, my best, dearest husband! You are too sad, my Amy. No, no. I hope and pray they may have long, busy, useful lives. They are blest and favoured who are suffered to do much for Christ below. We may sometimes think too much of the joy of resting with Jesus, --too little of the high privilege of working for Him long below; of suffering for Him if He wills it, --we can never suffer for Him in heaven. They were both silent for a minute, --bending over the little crib, --and then Amy spoke again: Yet, I am glad now that one is safe. O, Alexander! if I should be taken first, you will care for my little William; for Effie and Morgan I do not fear so much. Why should I fear for this one She kissed him again and again; and the child moved in his sleep, and laid his little hands upon her face. I think of James Mackenzie, and many others like him; and I fear for the feet that must tread such a difficult perilous way. But God can keep my darling...
